THE DUTY KIT, ON THE REAL BODY

A cop's belt, holster and badge went out of sight with the box body the real one replaced. Now the whole kit is built again on the real body.

- duty belt and buckle, holster and pistol, magazine pouches, radio, torch, cuff case, a CO's keys, the badge, the shoulder mic
- built by the kit's own rules round THIS body: the belt cut round its waistband, everything on it hung clear of its hips and thighs, at true size, nothing bent
- it rides the real skeleton (the belt on the pelvis, the badge on the chest) and follows the game: a guard's torch leaves the belt when it is in his hand
- the detective as he was designed: jacket off, dress shirt and a real tie, the gold shield on his belt, the pancake holster on his hip
- about a millisecond a person

Patrol, live in Gang City

The same crosswalk, the same camera. Before: a real body in a duty shirt, the belt and gun gone with the box body. After: the duty belt, the holster on the gun side, the badge and the radio mic.

BEFORE

AFTER

The gun side

The holster and pistol hang off the belt behind the right hip, clear of it, the way the kit hangs them on any body.

Sheriff, security, corrections

The hip, up close

The same officer, rig and camera. The belt now covers the shirt's tuck line; the holster hangs where the box body's did.

BEFORE

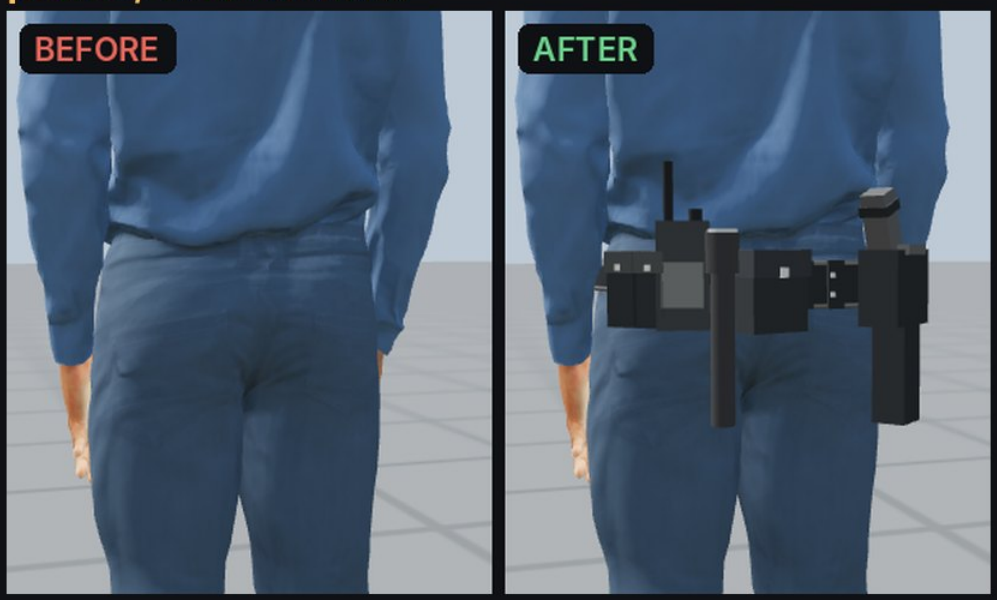

AFTER

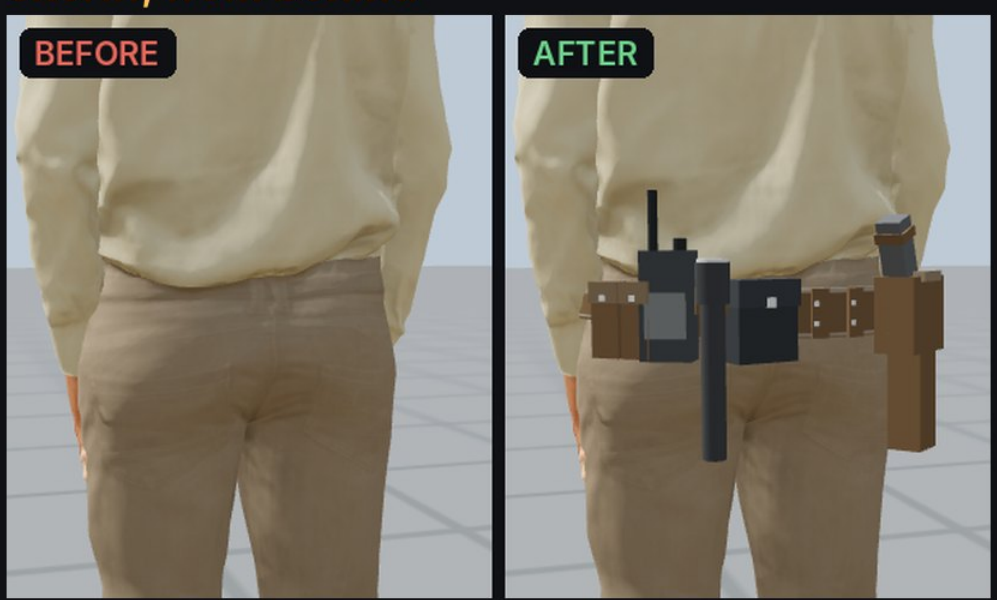

Round the back

The radio with its antenna, the torch in its ring, the cuff case, the magazine pouches, the keepers.

The detective

His outfit says it: at his desk, jacket off, dress shirt and tie, the gold shield clipped on his belt. The wardrobe had put him in a suit jacket, and his belt went round the jacket. Now the shirt, a tie made on it (no garment has a whole one), the shield and the pancake holster.

AFTER

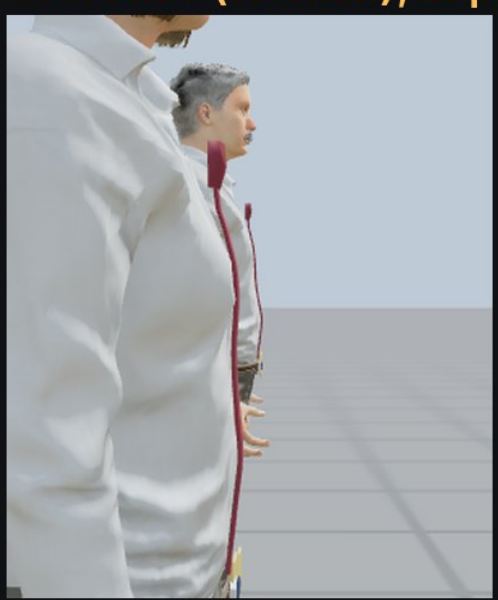

The tie lies on the shirt

Knotted at the open collar, a few millimetres off the placket all the way to the belt.

Every kit, before

The shipped code: real bodies, no kit.

Every kit, after

Police, corrections, sheriff, security, SWAT, the detectives: each kit rebuilt on its body.

On the chest

The badge over the left pocket (a star for the sheriff), the radio mic above it.

Walking

Mid-stride the belt stays on the waist and the holster rides the hip: the kit is skinned to the real pelvis and chest.

How it works

THE BUG. entities/dutykit.js hangs an officer's hard kit as one mesh built round the box body's own section. When a real (Blender) body takes over, the box body is hidden, and the kit was part of it: every cop in the city lost his belt and his gun the moment he came close enough to be real.

THE SECTION. people.js measures the real body's clothed surface once per build: 48 radii round its axis every centimetre from under the hips to over the shoulders, body and garments, the arms and head left out. A centimetre the garment's vertices skipped is filled from above and below, not round the ring (that borrowed the wider sides and stood the chest out by centimetres), then dilated a bin: a stiff belt bridges the folds under it.

BUILT AGAIN. dutykit.js is handed a body that answers with that section (CBZ.bodySection now asks a body for its own) and that chest. So the belt is cut round this waistband by the kit's own code, and the holster, pouches, radio and cuff case are hung off this belt and pushed clear of these hips and thighs by the same rules that hung them on the box body. Heights map hip to hip and shoulder to shoulder; the belt and everything on it keep their true size.

WORN. The kit is skinned to the real skeleton (the belt and all on it to the pelvis, the badge and mic to the chest), follows the game's kit (a guard's torch out of its ring, a re-dress, a strip) and hides when the game hides it. About a millisecond a person.

THE TIE. No garment in the pack has a whole tie (a suit's is modelled only where its jacket shows it), so the detective's is made on his shirt: a four-in-hand knot at the open collar, a blade cut wider toward the tip, laid a few millimetres off the shirt, skinned like the shirt under it.
