COPS THAT LOOK LIKE COPS

On a real body an officer lost his belt and his gun with the box body, and wore an open button-down over bare chest and jeans. Now: the uniform, and the whole duty kit on it.

- real uniform slacks, not jeans; the duty shirt over a crew-neck undershirt at its open collar (navy for a cop, white under a guard's black)
- duty belt and buckle, holster and pistol, magazine pouches, radio, torch, cuff case, a CO's keys, the badge, the radio mic
- the kit built by its own rules round THIS body, at true size, riding the real skeleton; it follows the game (a guard's torch leaves the belt in his hand)
- the detective in his suit and its real tie, the gold shield at his breast pocket, the gun under the jacket
- about a millisecond a person

Patrol, live in Gang City

The same crosswalk, the same camera. Before: a man in an open button-down and jeans, no belt, no gun. After: the uniform (slacks, the undershirt at the collar), the duty belt, the holster on the gun side, the badge and the radio mic.

AFTER

The gun side

The holster and pistol hang off the belt behind the right hip, clear of it, the way the kit hangs them on any body.

The uniform

Pressed slacks, the duty shirt, the crew-neck undershirt at the open collar, the patches, nameplate and badge, the belt and its kit. A patrol officer, not a man in a button-down.

The hip, up close

The same officer, rig and camera. Uniform slacks for the jeans, the belt over the shirt's tuck line, the holster where the box body's hung.

Round the back

The radio with its antenna, the torch in its ring, the cuff case, the magazine pouches, the keepers.

The detective

Plainclothes: his suit and its real tie, knotted at a closed collar. His duty belt and gun are under the jacket where a detective carries them; the gold shield shows at his breast pocket.

Every officer, before

The shipped code: real bodies in open button-downs and jeans, no kit.

Every officer, after

Police, corrections, sheriff, security, SWAT, the detectives: the uniform, and each kit rebuilt on its body.

On the chest

The undershirt at the open collar in the uniform's own collar colour, the badge over the left pocket (a star for the sheriff), the radio mic above it, the nameplate and the patches.

Walking

Mid-stride the belt stays on the waist and the holster rides the hip: the kit is skinned to the real pelvis and chest.

How it works

THE BUG. entities/dutykit.js hangs an officer's hard kit as one mesh built round the box body's own section. When a real (Blender) body takes over, the box body is hidden, and the kit was part of it: every cop in the city lost his belt and his gun the moment he came close enough to be real.

THE SECTION. people.js measures the real body's clothed surface once per build: 48 radii round its axis every centimetre from under the hips to over the shoulders, body and garments, the arms and head left out. A centimetre the garment's vertices skipped is filled from above and below, not round the ring (that borrowed the wider sides and stood the chest out by centimetres), then dilated a bin: a stiff belt bridges the folds under it.

BUILT AGAIN. dutykit.js is handed a body that answers with that section (CBZ.bodySection now asks a body for its own) and that chest. So the belt is cut round this waistband by the kit's own code, and the holster, pouches, radio and cuff case are hung off this belt and pushed clear of these hips and thighs by the same rules that hung them on the box body. Heights map hip to hip and shoulder to shoulder; the belt and everything on it keep their true size.

WORN. The kit is skinned to the real skeleton (the belt and all on it to the pelvis, the badge and mic to the chest), follows the game's kit (a guard's torch out of its ring, a re-dress, a strip) and hides when the game hides it. About a millisecond a person.

THE UNIFORM. Three real garments (all CC0, in the people pack): uniform wool slacks, pressed (their fold contrast cut, or dyed navy they read as denim); over them the duty shirt with its own jeans not worn (a zone of the garment dropped from its index); and a crew-neck tee worn UNDER the shirt. The tee shows only where the shirt leaves skin bare: a face is drawn only if the body vertices it is fitted to are bare, and it is fitted skin-tight so the shirt covers it everywhere else. It takes the outfit's own collar colour.

THE DETECTIVE. In his suit the duty belt is under his jacket: the kit is built CONCEALED, no belt or holster shown, the gold shield on the breast.
